Gen. Banks says the partial disintegration of the commands was the cause of the embarrassment though not of failure. He refers to the inability of tien. Steele to form a junction with the main column and the withdrawal of the main brigade before the movement was completed, and the fact that Gen. A. J. Smith's command could not remain with him but thirty days. He says Gen. A. J. Smith's command could not remain with him but thirty days. He says even had the army reached Shreveport it could not have maintained the position there. The only possible method of maintaining the position would have been to concentrate a force superior in numbers to the enemy, with sufficient time to pursue him, whatever way he should move, even if it took to Galvesten. This was suggested as a possible result of the campaign, but was embraced within the original plan, and was specially precluded by orders received from the Lieutenant General commanding the armies. He declares that the enemy was defeated in every encounter except that at Sabin Cross Roads, on the th of April.
